ANXIOUS DAYS

THE IMPACT, arising from Russia's apparent resolution to increase her sphere of power and impose her communistic system on the world, is nearing. The line is about to be drawn. Joseph Stalin is extending himself as far and as quickly as possible. Czechoslovakia, the cradle of democracy, has succumbed to coercion and Finland may be the next to fall. Events are shaping that way.

Meanwhile events are considered so urgent that Britain, France, Belgium, the Netherlands and Luxembourg are speeding their economic and military alliance.

These are anxious days and the possibilities are discomfiting. Even nations which normally cherish and preserve their neutrality to the last ditch are deeply concerned.

The next short time should tell.

ON CAPITALISM

F YOU OWN a hammer, you're a capitalist-this eye-catching statement heads up an advertisement of a Cleveland machine tool manufacturing firm which believes in active defence of private enterprise Democracy.

The ad points out that you paid money for the hammer that you own, because you can drive more nails with it in a day, and drive them better than you can with a rock or the heal of your shoe. You saved money to buy the hammer in order to increase and improve production. That is capital.

Then, suppose you hire a man to do repairs around your house. If he has no hammer and must drive nails with a rock, he won't get much repairing done in a day and so you can't afford to pay him much. His production and the quality of his work are improved when he is supplied with proper tools-so you can afford to pay him more. That's how capital and industry work together. But the work must produce enough earnings to pay the higher wages to the workers and a small wage to the owners of the machines-which is known as profit. Otherwise, why should the people who have saved money invest in the machines? With no returns they would refuse to invest, the tools would be allowed to deteriorate, production would fall off and wages would have to be lowered. And says the ad: "That's why workers should be just as much interested in making a profit for their company as in making high wages for themselves. No profitno wages."

A PROFESSION

A STOUT-HEARTED LADY from England has A had the courage to suggest in public that housework should be regarded as a profession. There was a time when professionals were all men, and college graduates at that, with their activities largely limited to the law, the ministry and medicine. For no particular reason at all, professional people came to be regarded as more respectable than non-professionals who worked just as hard.

Respectability has long been more cherished than either legality, a quiet soul, or healthy body, which may explain why professional status has spread far and wide to such diverse callings as boxing and newspaper work. There are even professional car thieves.

It took the world of sport to think up the most exasperating complication to all this by throwing in an amateur as the only alternative to a professional. Calling a person an amateur is downright insulting in any non-sporting field. And even sportsmen seem quite unable to agree on which is which. Housewives may look upon themselves as unpaid chars. Being professional won't lighten the load. It might add dignity, but housewives already have that rare dignity which comes from being needed and useful-something many people, including professionals, haven't got.

Even more than in other fields of industrial endeavour, the business of catching, processing and marketing fish is subject to constant change in technique and marketing trends.

Our objective is to make use of the latest equipment in harvesting the catch, and to process it in such a manner that it will retain peak quality and command distribution in all markets.

To achieve this goal, we exercise constant vigilance and make large expenditures to originate or adapt any operating methods which improve the quality of our product and the efficiency of our operations.

The combination of skilled British Columbia fishermen, modern processing plants and sound marketing knowledge contributes to British Columbia's prosperity by transforming our valuable fisheries resources into substantial payrolls.

Most prevalent fault in home vegetable gardens is failure to make several sowings of the short season crops. These are vegetables which mature in early summer; and which because they have grown swiftly, have a short season of harvest.

Too often the amateur gardener sows them once and, after the first brief harvest, goes without them. He is also likely to sow too much, so that most of his single crop is wasted. By dividing his seed and making several sowings, he could enjoy a harvest all summer long, with a new crop ready to use before the older sowing The accompanying table lists times, then sow 8 feet of beans, frosts arrive.
