A Worthwhile Project

A LTHOUGH it is not yet clear just how much work is planned immediately for establishment of an airport at Prince Rupert, it is good to know that this city is at last on the federal government's airways map.

It was, of course, inevitable that sooner or later this would occur. On the basis of its geographical position alone, Prince Rupert is a logical site for an airport. On the north-south runs it is approximately midway between the main air terminals of the west coast. At present, the only point servicing flights across this gap is Sandspit, where it will never be possible to develop an airfield meeting all the requirements of modern heavy aircraft and where crosswind conditions further reduce its value.

For east-west operations, the city is in an equally useful location. On roughly the same parallel as Edmonton, it presents unlimited possibilities as a coastal terminus for northern trans-continental flights. In time of war, or perhaps even of peace, it could develop into a strategic jumping-off point for trans-Pacific traffic. Its great advantage in this respect is that it is 500 miles closer to the Orient than any other Canadian centre and affords more immediate access to airports fringing the Gulf of Alaska.

Because of its geographical considerations, this site would be a natural one for an airport even if it had nothing else to offer. The clincher is, however, that Prince Rupert is unofficial capital of a region alive with expanding business. Consequently, an airport here will become much more than just a refuelling base or an emergency field. It will be a busy traffic centre in its own right as, in fact, it already is even though it must depend on a shuttle service to connect it with mainline operations.

While the logic of constructing an airport here has been evident for a long time, the project has nevertheless called for salesmanship. Without this, delay might have continued until sheer force of circumstances demanded action.

Although the bulldozers are by no means at work yet on Digby Island, or whatever location is selected, promise of action grows more definite all the time. Much credit for this must go to the man who has had the task of turning the sales campaign into an actual sale—Ted Applewhaite, member for Skeena.

Mr. Applewhaite has followed through at the Ottawa end, quietly and well. It has been a real service which, when consummated, will bring great benefit to the entire northwest.
