Forced To Land On Arctic Ice Pack

POINT BARROW, Alaska.-A pilot who made a forced landing on the arctic ice pack told here last night how he survived for a week without sleep at 50-below-zero temperatures before he was sighted by Air Force fliers searching in winter's almost endless darkness.

International Angles

V/HILE international attention is being directed W at the moment to the St. Lawrence seaway, there is another proposed hydro-electric development on the west coast which promises completely to overshadow the eastern project as a matter of concern to Canada and the U.S.A.

Recent comments on the Frobisher plan to itilize waters of northern B.C. and the Yukon as power for a giant chemical and metallurgical inlustry suggest it will be impossible to keep this entirely a Canadian matter. Although it was originally anticipated an effort would be made to create a Canadian sea port inside the Alaska pannandle near Tulsequah, where the plant probably will be located, there is evidence now that other ocean outlets are being sought.

A scheme to gain access to the sea by means of corridors across Alaskan territory appears to have stronger backing than that of the B.C. & Yukon Chamber of Mines which proposed it. Governor Heintzleman of Alaska is said to have expressed interest after being approached on a high level. It is understood he will make recommendations when he attends a conference in Washington later this month.

Elaborating on the subject, the Ketchikan laska Chronicle reports having information that Canadian engineers consider it would be impracical even to locate the industry at Tulsequah, let alone make any attempt to develop a port there. One reason given is that the Taku River valley is narrow and subject to floods which might endanger townsite (although so far the Cominco settlement there seems to have managed all right). Another is that it is too distant from headwaters and that a site on the Taiya River far to the north (where the Aluminum Company of America is hoping to start a similar project) would be preferable.

Another complication is that, while the federal government believes the water must be protected for Canadian use, Premier Bennett has said that B.C. will co-operate with the company, Canadian or American, which can best do the job. His remarks are based on the claim that, while the Dominion government makes the international agreements; B.C. has control of the water. By co-operation, the Premier evidently means that if a U.S. company developed the project, B.C. would get a share of the power for sale to other industries.

It makes a very tricky problem, particularly since care must be taken that a U.S. company using Canadian power would not undersell Canadian products. In view of the many angles involved, it as crows. It was a bare scrape-through in 1912 the Conservatives elect. would be well to go slowly . . . although it is to be hoped we are spared anything so leisurely as the negotiations on the St. Lawrence seaway.
