An Enthusiastic Group

PPEARANCE here tomorrow of the brilliant A French pianist, Pierre Sancan, brings to public attention the work of a loosely-knit but enthusiastic group called the Alaska Music Trail Auxiliary.

There is no such thing as a fixed membership list for this group, nor is there any planned schedule of meetings. There is no particular characteristic by which to identify those who do attend meetings when they are called except their one common denominator: a desire to promote good music and other arts in Prince Rupert.

To do this they will not spare any effort or leave any possibility unexplored. At times there are awesome financial barriers to face but, with a sort of inspired faith in public support, they plunge into the difficulties, willingly accept all the hard work of arrangements, and invariably crown their efforts with a concert or some other artistic presentation which brings infinite pleasure to those who attend.

The best-known performances which they have sponsored have, of course, been the Alaska Music Trail concerts themselves. But the auxiliary is not content with seeking out only the international celebrities. Convinced that Canadian talent has a real contribution to make, it keeps itself informed on the movements and progress of Canadian artists and, when one of particular promise comes within reach, it does its best to see that Prince Rupert is included in the itinerary. Those who heard James Milligan, of Toronto, recently will appreciate the auxiliary's efforts in this respect.

But this group does not define a Canadian as citizen of the country living outside Prince Rupert. Its members are anxious to give every encouragement to local musicians and, with this in mind, recently sponsored the Shrine Band concert. They are making similar preparations for a concert by the Prince Rupert Symphony Orchestra to be given later this month. a purpose and prepared to accept the burden of work themselves.
