

Beware the War Mongers . . .

While blame is rightfully enough heaped on the German industrialists for inspiring and inciting war, it might be remembered that all the contributors to Germany's arming were not in Germany alone. There were many nations who had a finger one way or another in that iniqui-

It is not to be suggested for a moment that we can get along without armament making but, henceforth, our arms must be made for the purpose of deterring the would-be aggressors rather than fitting them out and encouraging them in their nefarious designs.

Surely we have seen how our uncontrolled financing of the Germans and our material assistance to the Japanese recoiled on ourselves and the world. The easy profits looked good for a while but there are none of us who do not understand how costly they were to us in the end.

While we bring expiation to the international scoundrels who encouraged and prepared Germany and Japan for aggressive warfare, we must meticulously guard in future against any possibility of our own contributing again to the furthering of such wicked works.

WARTIME ROLE OF RAILWAYS

British Transport System Did Huge Job In Armament Production

LONDON, Nov. 24 (P)-British railways have lifted secrecy which for long shrouded wartime operations.

Their transportation role is almost overshadowed by the job The story now is told in a 60- extended main line electrificapage illustrated booklet, prepared by the British Railways Press Office.

At the height of the war British railways and London Transport had nearly 20,000 of their staf in 35 workshops engaged in production of arma-These ranged from tanks, aircraft, guns, shells, bombs and tools to two-men midget submarine superstructures, landing craft, Bailey bridge parts and quick release
