Dredge Naval Base Out of Ocean Floor

By GEORGE FRANKS
DEN HELDER, The Netherlands (Reuters)—Hydraulic engineers and dike-builders, using centuries of experience to serve defence needs, are building a great new naval base here at the northernmost tip of the Netherlands.

They are scooping the naval base out of the ocean—dredging sand from the ocean floor to form two giant ship basins and then using the sand they have dredged up to build dikes and provide land for shore installations.

When they finish, they will have a brand new base to replace the old tradition-steeped Den Helder, demolished during the German wartime occupation. It had served as a key harbor in the Netherlands' 18th-Century sea battles with England and for three centuries was the country's main naval training centre.

BOMB-PROOF

Experts say the new base will be virtually bomb-proof, chiefly because of its size. Even the largest bomb, they say, "would only make one more hole in the ocean or perhaps make us a third entrance to our new harbor."

The dikes will be so wide, they say, that no bomb could break them open or do more than limited damage.

A plan for its construction was drawn up in 1947. Its estimated cost at that time was about $7,500,000. The plan calls for construction of two large sea basins, many acres of buildings and workshops, a score of double-sided berths for warships of all sizes, a floating dry dock to hold the largest known battleship and huge protecting dikes.

The work is going on in the Wadden Sea, the stretch of water between the Zuyder Zee dike and the Frisian Islands, the chain of islands fringing Holland in the North Sea.

The project is divided into two parts. The first basin will be finished in 1954, the second in 1957.

The project is being paid for entirely out of normal budget funds. But it will cost considerably more than the original estimate of $7,500,000. Already most of that has been spent, and there are several years' work ahead.

Red Cross at High School

Provincial Organizer Is Confident That Bo-Me-Hi
Will Become Active

Miss Margaret Palmer, former local school girl, one time teacher here and in more recent years organizer of Junior Red Cross for British Columbia, after a meeting yesterday with the student body of Booth Memorial High School and a conference later with the Students' Council, went away satisfied that Prince Rupert will not much longer be one of the few high schools in British Columbia and about the only one in this district that is not actively interested in Red Cross work.

"I am sure," Miss Palmer told the Daily News last evening before she sailed on the Prince George for Vancouver after spending a few days here following a tour through the central interior, that "the high school students go want to carry on Junior Red Cross work and I am certainly hopeful that they will."

Miss Palmer outlined the Red Cross program to the student body including health promotional activities, help to crippled and underprivileged children, and overseas relief.

Principal A. M. Hurst presided and gave his approval to the idea, emphasizing the importance of having an objective the benefits of which were essentially confined to the immediate vicinity of the school. Miss Palmer was given a pathetic reception. At the student council meeting which followed a lively discussion of the high school assembly was being asked to take elementary school already active in the success of them with a job," Miss Palmer said their steady progress the time."

While here Miss Palmer and conferred with Rum stories...

"To train the shark was not so simple as you may think," said the bosun.

"Fortunately, the brig when she grounded was loaded with Lamb's Navy Rum. By judiciously rewarding my finny friend with dark invigorating tots, I so influenced his mind that he would give me the better fish and lobster, retaining for himself only inferior qualities like A trivial point, perhaps, but I thought good for discipline. I was about to send him to bring me a wife from among the girls bathing in a distant lagoon, when suddenly I saw a sail. Instantly mounting the shark I went alongside and pausing only to present him with the corkscrew, climbed aboard."

"That's a Rum Story," said the wedding guest inattentively.

"Very kind of you, I'm sure, sir," replied the man.

"I could just fancy a Lamb's Navy Rum."
